observations & insights

In our on-site research, we found cramped, static spaces designed for passive one-way learning: tight rows of desks and chairs that inhibit movement and interaction, and instructors confined to the front of the room, where there are few opportunities to connect with students.

Students are bringing new tools, new attitudes and new expectations into the classroom. In order to keep pace, the classroom has to change. Research points to the fact that learning is enhanced when it is social and active. A single approach to teaching is no longer enough. Educators are now turning to multiple pedagogies to support multiple learning styles.
